A Cold-Blooded Killer with a Charismatic Facade

Charles Sobhraj was a man of contradictions. He possessed an undeniable charm and charisma that he used to lure his victims into a false sense of security. Yet, beneath his alluring exterior lay a cold-blooded killer, capable of unspeakable cruelty.

Sobhraj's victims were primarily young, Western travelers who he met through hostels or on the beaches of Thailand, Nepal, and India. He would befriend them, gain their trust, and then rob them of their money and belongings. In some cases, he would even go further, drugging, torturing, and murdering his victims in a series of sadistic and depraved acts.

A Web of Deception and a Trail of Victims

Sobhraj's crimes were not limited to isolated incidents. He operated within a network of accomplices, including his girlfriend Marie-Andrée Leclerc and his close friend Ajay Chowdhury. Together, they created a complex web of deceit, using forged passports, false identities, and elaborate scams to evade capture.

As Sobhraj's body count grew, so did the international manhunt for the elusive killer. Interpol issued a Red Notice for his arrest, and authorities from multiple countries joined forces to track him down. Yet, for years, Sobhraj managed to stay one step ahead, using his cunning and connections to escape detection.

The Unraveling of the Serpent's Web

Finally, in 1976, Sobhraj's luck ran out. He was arrested in New Delhi, India, after an attempted drug deal went awry. The Indian authorities, aided by the unwavering determination of Interpol, gathered overwhelming evidence against him, including eyewitness testimony and forensic analysis.

In 1977, Sobhraj was convicted of multiple murders and sentenced to life imprisonment. He spent the next two decades behind bars, maintaining his innocence and spinning tales of conspiracy and injustice.
